Or is it a compound of dea, dia, deus, and mon, a word signifying evil, from the Persian? I place little confidence in these conjectures.]

A spirit, or immaterial being, holding a middle place between men and the celestial deities of the pagans. The ancients believed that there were good and evil demons, which had influence over the minds of men, and that these beings carried on an intercourse between men and gods, conveying the addresses of men to the gods, and divine benefits to men. Hence demons became the objects of worship. It was supposed, also, that human spirits, after their departure from the body, became demons, and that the souls of virtuous men, if highly purified, were exalted from demons into gods. In the Scriptures, the Greek δαιμων is rendered devil, and sometimes, at least, improperly; for nothing is more certain than that different beings are intended by διαβολος and δαιμων. The demons of the New Testament were supposed to be spiritual beings which vexed and tormented men. And, in general, the word, in modern use, signifies an evil spirit or genius, which influences the conduct or directs the fortunes of mankind. [See Campbell's Dissert.]

In Ir. drag is fire; in W. dragon is a leader, chief, or sovereign, from dragiaw, to draw. In Scotch, the word signifies a paper kite, as also in Danish; probably from the notion of flying or shooting along, like a fiery meteor. In Welsh, draig is rendered by Owen a procreator or generating principle, a fiery serpent, a dragon, and the Supreme; and the plural, dreigiau, silent lightnings, dreigiaw, to lighten silently. This word coincides nearly with dally in its primitive signification, and may be of the same family. Its radical sense is probably to draw out in time; hence, to hold, rest, remain. We see like senses united in many words, as in teneo, τεινω, continue. See DALLY, and Class Dl, No. 3, 5, 6, 21.]

E.

E, the second vowel and the fifth letter of the English alphabet, seems to be the ancient Phenician and Hebrew ɜ inverted, corresponding nearly with the Chaldaic and later Hebrew ה. Its long and natural sound in English coincides with the sound of i in the Italian and French languages, and is formed by a narrower opening of the glottis than that of a. It has a long sound, as in here, mere, me; a short sound, as in met, men; and the sound of a open or long, in there, prey, vein. As a final letter, it is generally quiescent; but it serves to lengthen the sound of the preceding vowel, or at least to indicate that the preceding vowel is to have its long sound, as in mane, cane, plume, which, without the final e, would be pronounced man, can, plum. After c and g, the final e serves to indicate that c is to be pronounced as s, and g as j. Thus, without the final e in mace, [mase,] this word would be pronounced mac, [mak,] and rage [rāj] would be pronounced rag. In a numerous class of words, — indeed in almost every word, except a few from the Greek, — the final e is silent, serving no purpose whatever, unless to show from what language we have received the words; and in many cases, it does not answer this purpose. In words ending in ive, as active; in ile, as futile; in ine, as in sanguine, examine; in ite, as in definite; e is, for the most part, silent. In some of these words, the use of e is borrowed from the French; in most or all cases, it is not authorized by the Latin originals; it is worse than useless, as it leads to a wrong pronunciation; and the retaining of it in such words is beyond measure absurd.

When two of this vowel occur together, the sound is the same as that of the single e long, as in deem, esteem, need; and it occurs often with a and i, as in mean, hear, siege, deceive, in which cases, when one vowel only has a sound, the combination I call a digraph, [double written.] In these combinations, the sound is usually that of e long, but sometimes the short sound of e, as in lĕad, a metal, rĕad, pret. of rēad, and sometimes the sound of a long, as in reign, feign, pronounced rane, fane. Irregularities of this kind are not reducible to rules.

As a numeral, E stands for 250. In the calendar, it is the fifth of the dominical letters. As an abbreviation, it stands for East, as in charts; E. N. E., east-north-east; E. S. E., east-south-east; E. by S., east by south.

ĒACH, (ēch,) a. [Scot. eik. This word is either a contraction of the Sax. ælc, elc, D. elk, or the Ir. ceach, or gach, Basque gucia, Fr. chaque, with the loss of the first articulation. With the Celtic corresponds the Russ. kajdei, each. I am inclined to believe both the English and Scottish words to be contractions of the Celtic ceach.]

*1. A rapacious bird of the genus Falco. The beak is crooked, and furnished with a cere at the base, and the tongue is cloven or bifid. There are several species, as the bald or white-headed eagle, the sea eagle or ossifrage, the golden eagle, &c.

The eagle is one of the largest species of birds, has a keen sight, and preys on small animals, fish, &c. He lives to a great age; and it is said that one died at Vienna, after a confinement of a hundred and four years. On account of the elevation and rapidity of his flight, and of his great strength, he is called the king of birds. Hence the figure of an eagle was made the standard of the Romans, and a spread eagle is a principal figure in the arms of the United States of America. Hence, also, in heraldry, it is one of the most noble bearings in armory.

These nodules often embrace at the center a kernel or nucleus, sometimes movable, and always differing from the exterior in color, density, and fracture. EARN, v. i. To curdle. North of England.

EARN'ED, (ernd,) pp. Merited by labor or performance; gained.

EARN'EST, (ern'est,) a.† [Sax. eornest or geornest, from georn, desirous, studious, diligent, assiduous, whence georn-ian, gyrnan, to desire, to yearn; Dan. gierne, willingly, freely, gladly, cheerfully; gierning, a deed, act, exploit; Ger. ernst; D. ernst; W. ern, earnest-money. The radical sense is, to strive to advance, to reach forward, to urge, to strain.]

1. Ardent in the pursuit of an object; eager to obtain; having a longing desire; warmly engaged or incited.

They are never more earnest to disturb us, than when they see us most earnest in this duty. Duppa.

2. Ardent; warm; eager; zealous; animated; importunate; as, earnest in love; earnest in prayer.

3. Intent; fixed.

Their earnest eyes were fixed. Milton.

4. Serious; important; that is, really intent or engaged; whence the phrase in earnest. To be in earnest, is to be really urging or stretching toward an object; intent on a pursuit. Hence, from fixed attention, comes the sense of seriousness in the pursuit, as opposed to trifling or jest. Are you in earnest or in jest?

EARN'EST, (ern'est,) n.† Seriousness; a reality; a real event; as opposed to jesting or feigned appearance.

Take heed that this jest do not one day turn to earnest. Sidney.

2. First fruits; that which is in advance, and gives promise of something to come. Early fruit may be an earnest of fruit to follow. The Christian's peace of mind, in this life, is an earnest of future peace and happiness. The earnest of the Spirit is given to the saints, as the assurance of their future enjoyment of God's favor and presence.

3. A part paid or delivered beforehand, as money or goods, under a contract, as a pledge and security for the whole. Thus, earnest, or earnest-money, is a first payment or deposit, giving promise or assurance of full payment, and serving also to bind the seller to the terms of the agreement. McCulloch.

Hence the practice of giving an earnest to ratify a bargain.

4. In a wider sense, a pledge or assurance of more to come hereafter; as, to give earnest of success.

EARTH, (erth,) n. [Sax. eard, eorth, yrth; D. aarde; G. erde; Sw. iord, jord; Dan. iord; Scot. erd, yerd, yerth; Turk. jerda; Tartaric, yirda. It coincides with the Heb. אֶרֶץ. The Ar. أَرْض aradh, from which the Arabic and Hebrew words corresponding to the Teutonic above, are derived, signifies to eat, gnaw, or corrode as a worm, or the teredo. It is obvious, then, that the primary sense of earth is fine particles, like mold. The verb may be רִצַּץ, to break or bruise. The Ch. and Syr. אַרְעָא, earth, may be contracted from the same word. See CORRODE.]

1. Earth, in its primary sense, signifies the particles which compose the mass of the globe, but more particularly, the particles which form the fine mold on the surface of the globe; or it denotes any indefinite mass or portion of that matter. We throw up earth with a spade or plow; we fill a pit or ditch with earth; we form a rampart with earth. This substance being considered, by ancient philosophers, as simple, was called an element; and, in popular language, we still hear of the four elements, fire, air, earth, and water.

2. In chemistry, the term earth was, till lately, employed to denote a supposed simple elementary body or substance, defined to be tasteless, inodorous, uninflammable, and infusible. But it has also been applied to substances which have a very sensible alkaline taste, as lime. The primitive earths have been reckoned ten in number; of which five are considered earths proper, namely, alumina, glucina, yttria, zirconia, and thorina; four possess decided alkaline properties, namely, baryta, strontia, lime or calcia, and magnesia; and one, silica, is regarded as an acid, and often called silicic acid. Recent experiments prove that all of them, except silica, are compounds of oxygen with metallic bases.
Davy. Silliman. Phillips. Ure.

3. The terraqueous globe which we inhabit. The earth is nearly spherical, but a little flatted at the poles, and hence its figure is called an oblate spheroid. It is one of the primary planets, revolving round the sun in an orbit which is between those of Venus and Mars. It is nearly eight thousand miles in diameter, and twenty-five thousand miles in circumference. Its mean distance from the sun is about ninety-five millions of miles, and its annual revolution constitutes the year of 365 days, 5 hours, and nearly 49 minutes.

E-LEC-TRIC'I-TY, n. [from Gr. ηλεκτρον, amber.]

1. The subtile agent called the electric fluid, usually excited by the friction of glass. It was called electricity from the Greek word for amber, because it was in the friction of this substance that it was first observed. It is convenient to denominate it the electric fluid, although we know very little of its nature, because it has a greater resemblance to an elastic fluid of extreme rarity than to any thing else with which we are acquainted. Some bodies permit the electric fluid to pass freely through them, and are hence called conductors; others hardly permit it to pass through them at all, and are therefore called non-conductors. Metals are the best conductors; next, water and all moist substances; and next, the bodies of animals. Glass, resinous substances, (as amber, varnish, and sealing-wax,) air, silk, wool, cotton, hair, and feathers, are non-conductors. The phenomena of electricity are such as attraction and repulsion, heat and light, shocks of the animal system, and mechanical violence. Olmsted.

EL'E-GANCE, } n.† [L. elegantia; Fr. elegance; It.
EL'E-GAN-CY, } eleganza; probably from L. eligo, to choose, though irregularly formed.]

In its primary sense, this word signifies that which is choice or select, as distinguished from what is common.

1. "The beauty of propriety, not of greatness," says Johnson.

Applied to manners or behavior, elegance is that fine polish, politeness, or grace, which is acquired by a genteel education, and an association with well-bred company.

Applied to language, elegance respects the manner of speaking or of writing. Elegance of speaking, is the propriety of diction and utterance, and the gracefulness of action or gesture; comprehending correct, appropriate, and rich expressions, delivered in an agreeable manner. Elegance of composition, consists in correct, appropriate, and rich expressions, or well-chosen words, arranged in a happy manner. Elegance implies neatness, purity, and correct, perspicuous arrangement, and is calculated to please a delicate taste, rather than to excite admiration or strong feeling. Elegance is applied also to form. Elegance, in architecture, consists in the due symmetry and distribution of the parts of an edifice, or in regular proportions and arrangement. And, in a similar sense, the word is applied to the person or human body. It is applied also to penmanship, denoting that form of letters which is most agreeable to the eye. In short, in a looser sense, it is applied to many works of art or nature remarkable for their beauty: as. elegance of dress, or furniture.

2. That which pleases by its nicety, symmetry, purity, or beauty. In this sense it has a plural; as, the nicer elegancies of art. Spectator.

5. Nice; sensible to beauty; discriminating beauty from deformity or imperfection; as, an elegant taste.

[This is a loose application of the word; elegant being used for delicate.]

6. Beautiful in form and colors; pleasing; as, an elegant flower.

7. Rich; costly and ornamental; as, elegant furniture or equipage

EL'E-GANT-LY, adv. In a manner to please; with elegance; with beauty; with pleasing propriety; as, a composition elegantly written.

[Sax. ælf, or elfenne, a spirit, the nightmare; a ghost, hag, or witch; Sw. älfver. In W. el is a moving principle, a spirit; elv is the same; elu is to move onward, to go; elven is an operative cause, a constituent part, an element; and elf is what moves in a simple or pure state, a spirit or demon. From these facts it would seem that elf is from a verb signifying to move, to flow; and ælf or elf in Swedish, elv in Danish, is a river, whence Elbe. So spirit is from blowing, a flowing, of air. In Sax. æl is oil, and an ecl, and ælan is to kindle; all perhaps from the sense of moving, flowing, or shooting along. The elf seems to correspond to the demon of the Greeks.]

ER, the termination of many English words, is the Teutonic form of the Latin or; the one contracted from wer, the other from vir, a man. It denotes an agent, originally of the masculine gender, but now applied to men or things indifferently; as in hater, farmer, heater, grater. At the end of names of places, er signifies a man of the place; Londoner is the same as London man.

There is a passage in Herodotus, Melpomene, 110, in which the word wer, vir, a man, is mentioned as used by the Scythians; a fact proving the affinity of the Scythian and the Teutonic nation. Τας δε Αμαζονας καλεουσι οι Σκυθαι Οιορπατα. Δυναται δε το ουνομα τουτο κατ' Ελλαδα γλωσσαν ανδροκτονοι. Οιορ γαρ καλεουσι τον ανδρα, το δε πατα, κτεινειν. "The Scythians call the Amazons Oiorpata, a word which may be rendered in Greek men-killers; for oior is the name they give to man; pata signifies to kill." Pata, in the Burman language, signifies to kill; but it is probable that this is really the English beat; W. bachi, to kill.

Their motion. Milton.

[This sense, though often used by Gibbon, seems to be obsolescent.]

Expect, in its legitimate sense, always refers to a future event. [The common phrase, I expect it was, is as vulgar as it is improper.]

3. To require or demand; as, payment will be expected when the note falls due. Whateley.

EX-PECT'AN-CY, n. In law, a state of waiting or suspension. An estate in expectancy, is one which is to take effect or commence after the determination of another estate. Estates of this kind are remainders and reversions. A remainder, or estate in remainder, is one which is limited to take effect and be enjoyed after another estate is determined. Thus, when a grant of land is made to A for twenty years, and, after the determination of that term, to B and his heirs forever, A is tenant for years, remainder to B in fee. In this case, the estate of B is in expectancy, that is, waiting for the determination of the estate for years. A reversion is the residue of an estate left in the grantor, to commence in possession after the determination of a particular estate granted out by him. As, when A leases an estate to B for twenty years, after the determination of that period, the estate reverts to the lessor; but, during the term, the estate of the lessor is in expectancy. Blackstone.

EX-PECT-Ā'TION, n. [L. expectatio.]

1. The act of expecting or looking forward to a future event with at least some reason to believe the event will happen. Expectation differs from hope. Hope originates in desire, and may exist with little or no ground of belief that the desired event will arrive. Expectation is founded on some reasons which render the event probable. Hope is directed to some good; expectation is directed to good or evil.

The same weakness of mind which indulges absurd expectations, produces petulance in disappointment. Irving.

6. In chances, the value of any prospect of prize or property depending upon the happening of some uncertain event. A sum of money, to be paid when an event happens, has a determinate value before that event happens. If the chances of receiving or not receiving a hundred dollars, when an event arrives, are equal, then, before the arrival of the event the expectation is worth half the money. Barlow. Encyc.

Many of these are fixed by law; but gratuities to professional men are also called fees.

FEE, n. [This word is usually deduced from Sax. feoh, cattle, property, and fee, a reward. This is a mistake. Fee, in land, is a contraction of feud or fief, or from the same source; It. fede, Sp. fe, faith, trust. Fee, a reward, from feoh, is a Teutonic word; but fee, feud, fief, are words wholly unknown to the Teutonic nations, who use, as synonymous with them, the word which in English is loan. This word fee, in land or an estate in trust, was first used among the descendants of the northern conquerors of Italy, but it originated in the south of Europe. See FEUD.]

Primarily, a loan of land, an estate in trust, granted by a prince or lord, to be held by the grantee on condition of personal service, or other condition; and, if the grantee or tenant failed to perform the conditions, the land reverted to the lord or donor, called the landlord, or lend-lord, the lord of the loan. A fee, then, is any land or tenement held of a superior on certain conditions. It is synonymous with fief and feud. All the land in England, except the crown land, is of this kind. Fees are absolute or limited. An absolute fee, or fee-simple, is land which a man holds to himself and his heirs forever, who are called tenants in fee-simple. Hence, in modern times, the term fee or fee-simple denotes an estate of inheritance; and, in America, where lands are not generally held of a superior, a fee, or fee-simple, is an estate in which the owner has the whole property, without any condition annexed to the tenure. A limited fee, is an estate limited or clogged with certain conditions; as, a qualified or base fee, which ceases with the existence of certain conditions; and a conditional fee, which is limited to particular heirs. Blackstone. Encyc.

In the United States, an estate in fee, or fee-simple, is what is called in English law an allodial estate, an estate held by a person in his own right, and descendible to the heirs in general.

FEL'ON, n. [Fr. felon; Low L. felo; Arm. fellon; It. fello, or fellone, a thief. I accord with Spelman in deducing this word from the root of fail, the original signification being, a vassal who failed in his fidelity or allegiance to his lord, and committed an offense by which he forfeited his feud. Hence, in French, felon is traitorous, rebellious. So the word is explained and deduced in Gregoire's Armoric Dictionary. The derivation from fee and lon, in Spelman, copied by Blackstone, is unnatural.]

FEL'ON-Y, n. [See FELON.] In common law, any crime which incurs the forfeiture of lands or goods. Treason was formerly comprised under the name of felony, but is now distinguished from crimes thus denominated, although it is really a felony. All offenses punishable with death are felonies; and so are some crimes not thus punished, as suicide, homicide by chance-medley, or in self-defense, and petty larceny. Capital punishment, therefore, does not necessarily enter into the true idea or definition of felony; the true criterion of felony being forfeiture of lands or goods. But the idea of felony has been so generally connected with that of capital punishment, that law and usage now confirm that connection. Thus, if a statute makes any new offense a felony, it is understood to mean a crime punishable with death. Blackstone.

The sensible internal motion of the constituent particles of animal and vegetable substances, occasioned by a certain degree of heat and moisture, and accompanied by an extrication of gas and heat. Fermentation is followed by a change of properties in the substances fermented, arising from new combinations of their principles. It may be defined, in its most general sense, any spontaneous change which takes place in animal or vegetable substances after life has ceased. It is of three principal kinds; vinous, acetous, and putrefactive. The term is also applied to other processes, as the panary fermentation, or the raising of bread; but it is limited by some authors to the vinous and acetous fermentations, which terminate in the production of alcohol or vinegar. Fermentation differs from effervescence. The former is confined to animal and vegetable substances; the latter is applicable to mineral substances. 1. Primarily, a deadly quarrel; hatred and contention that were to be terminated only by death. Among our rude ancestors, these quarrels, though originating in the murder of an individual, involved the whole tribe or family of the injured and of the aggressing parties. Hence, in modern usage,
2. A contention or quarrel; particularly, an inveterate quarrel between families or parties in a state; the discord and animosities which prevail among the citizens of a state or city, sometimes accompanied with civil war. In the north of Great Britain, the word is still used in its original sense; denoting a combination of kindred to revenge the death of any of their blood, on the offender and all his race, or any other great enemy. We say, it is the policy of our enemies to raise and cherish intestine feuds.
The word is not strictly applicable to wars between different nations, but to intestine wars, and to quarrels and animosities between families or small tribes.
FEUD, n. Usually supposed to be composed of the Teutonic fee, goods, reward, and ead or odh, W. eiaw, possession, property. But if feuds had been given as rewards for services, that consideration would have vested the title to the land in the donee. Yet feud is not a Teutonic or Gothic word, being found among none of the northern nations of Europe. This word originated in the south of Europe, whether in France, Spain, or Italy, may perhaps be ascertained by writings of the middle ages, which I do not possess. It probably originated among the Franks, or in Lombardy or Italy, and certainly among men who studied the civil law. In Italian, a feoffee is called fede-commessario, a trust-commissary; fede-commesso is a feoffment, a trust-estate; Sp. fideicomiso, a feoffment. These words are the fidei-commissarius, fiaci-commissum, of the Digest and Codex. In Spanish, fiado signifies security given for another, or bail; al fiado, on trust; fiador, one who trusts; feudo, a fief, fee, or feud; Port. id. In Norman, fitz de chevalers signifies knight's fees. Feud, then, with fee, which is a contraction of it, is a word formed from the L. fides, It. fede, Sp. fe, Norm. fei, faith, trust, with had, state, or ead or odh, estate; and a feud is an estate in trust, or on condition, which coincides nearly in sense with the northern word, G. lehen, D. leen; Sw. län, Dan. lehn, Eng. loan. From the origin of this word, we see the peculiar propriety of calling the donee fidelis, and his obligation to his lord fidelitas, whence fealty.]
A fief; a fee; a right to lands or hereditaments held in trust, or on the terms of performing certain conditions; the right which a vassal or tenant has to the lands or other immovable thing of his lord, to use the same and take the profits thereof hereditarily, rendering to his superior such duties and services as belong to military tenure, &c., the property of the soil always remaining in the lord or superior.
From the foregoing explanation of the origin of the word, result very naturally the definition of the term, and the doctrine of forfeiture, upon non-performance of the conditions of the trust or loan.

Most of the former have the opening of the gills closed by a peculiar covering, called the gill-lid; many of the latter have no gill-lid, and are hence said to breathe through apertures.
